Course Description
This is an introductory level course intended to give students a comprehensive understanding of the institutions, processes, and actors which operate within the American political system. The class begins with an analysis of the founding fathers and their intentions in forming the American political system and continues through modern political institutions and policy making. An emphasis is placed on the role of the individual citizen and the citizenry as whole in the success or failure of democratic regimes. It is expected and hoped that the course will stimulate students to seek a further understanding of their political world through additional coursework and/or through a continued interest in political activities and events. Without an active, involved, and educated citizenry, democratic governments are destined to fail.

General Education Requirements:
This course fulfills general education requirements by addressing: (1) The nature of the political person; (2) Different levels of association, including individual social networks, political parties, interest groups and other political organizations; (3) Various approaches to social analysis, including historical inquiry and quantitative data analysis; and (4) Patterns of imagined best societies and the discoveries of unintended consequences - particularly within the context of democratic theory and democratic governance.
