Nothing should humble philosophers and statesmen more than the history of our Revolution; for never were there events that were greater, more remotely begun, better prepared, and less foreseen. Even Frederick the Great, despite his genius, did not anticipate it. He touched it without seeing it. Moreover, he acted according to its spirit in advance; he was its precursor and, so to speak, its agent; but he did not recognize its approach. When the Revolution finally appeared, the new and extraordinary traits that came to distinguish it from the mass of previous revolutions at first escaped notice.

—Alexis de Tocqueville, The Old Regime & the Revolution
